

What is known to us as matter, in its various forms and states, is commonly conceived of as something quite distinct from force. In this inquiry, matter will be considered to be force itself, manifested in endless diversity of adaptation to our nature and wants. The exposition of this view will not, however, be reached until an advanced stage of the discussion. Until then it will be necessary to conform the language employed to the prevailing idea of a distinction between matter and force. Otherwise the truths which are presented in the earlier papers would not be conveyed with clearness. This conception of the identity of matter with force must be regarded as fundamental in true philosophy. In every department of thought there is to be observed a reluctance to recognize the fact that we are surrounded by mysteries. While in reality all things pass the limit of our understanding, there are not wanting minds which refuse to confess that any thing does so. Instructors generally feel called upon to explain every thing. In order that they may seem to do this, they assume imaginary starting-points, which, having been devised either by themselves or by their instructors, are of course quite within their comprehension.
