

Textbook presents a fascinating look into the business principles and practices of human resource administration from the 1960s era. An interesting read for those who wish to compare modern HR theory and track its evolution from that of a half-century ago. From Preface: In summary, the book is based upon three assumptions. They are: administration is human administration; the administrative function includes all the interpersonal relationship in the total work environment; and, as organizations are human organisms, the economic and physical resources are unimportant relative to the human resource. Within the parameters set by these premises, the book recognizes and critically evaluates three of the most pressing problems facing present-day management, namely, automation (and its inevitable companion, technological change), relations with minority groups, and the necessity for adapting to a changing environment, including the mushrooming and irrevocable movement to international operations.
